Built in 1870, the Arrington railroad depot was the last remaining station on the Southern Railroad line in Nelson County, Virginia. The structure's wide overhangs and quality construction kept it in good condition for more than 130 years.

For decades, the Arrington depot — or “Arrington Summit” as it was called in early railway records (because it was the highest station above sea level on the Southern Railway system) — served as the hub for local commerce.

In 1915, the track was lowered, a new depot was constructed, and the old depot retired from service. Over time the depot served as a barbershop, a drugstore and an antique mall. From 1961 to 1982 it was the site of the Arrington Post Office.

In 2007, Jeremy Hale bought and dismantled the building to save it from destruction after the land on which it sat on was sold. Steve Crandall purchased the building from Jeremy and hired Richard Boyd (The Java Depot's co-owner) and Robin Meyer to design a new “depot” using the dismantled building.

Today, the 150-year-old building is once again a cozy gathering place for both locals and travelers. In addition to coffees and a lively array of homemade food, The Java Depot's numerous windows and high ceilings offer a taste of local history, along with a panoramic view of the Three Ridges mountain chain.
